Vanessa Hernandez

The myth of the island Patmos of Greece (originally “Letois”, after Artemis, the daughter of Leto) is used as a metaphor in Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz’s Primero Sueño. According to the myth, Selene (the moon goddess), in one of Artemis’s visits, shone moonlight upon the island, found at the bottom of the sea. Through the aid of Apollo, Artemis was able to convince Zeus to shine the light of the sun upon the island and bring Patmos to the surface. The myth puts forth an image that meshes nicely with the theme of Sor Juana’s poem: the process of the awakening of the spirit, in this case through the attainment of knowledge.

That idea led to what was to become the plot of the story: Nova, an arboresque female born from the roots of a tree, rises from the ground after moonlight casts upon her place of origin and she embarks on a journey of mental, emotional, and spiritual awakening, only to feel fully alive at sunrise.

Let yourself be immersed in my world of trees, underworld creatures, and brief and sweet encounters.

Special thanks to the John B. Hurford ’60 Center for the Arts and Humanities for providing me with a stipend that allowed me to continue working on my etchings. Many, many thanks to my advisor, Hee Sook Kim and my professors (Markus Baenziger, John Goodrich, Vita Litvak, Ying Li, and William Williams) for the support, encouragement and advice they gave me throughout the year. And thanks to Bruce Bumbarger for teaching me the delicate process involved in the of making a clamshell box.

Y muchísimas gracias a mi mamá y a mi papá; sin ellos no tendría la oportunidad de estudiar lo que más amo, el arte.

For more information, please visit: vanessahernandezart.com